Revere must ride to Lexington, post-haste, see Hancock and Adams, and warn them to be on their guard. Of course, the British column, on its march, must pass through Lexington. Revere hurries off to get ready. But, as he may not be able to give the guards the slip, he thinks of the signal agreed upon. He first sees a friend whom he can trust, and gets him to make the signal. Then he picks up two more friends, and together they glide like shadows down the grass-grown wharf, draw a canoe from its hiding-place, and with muffled oars push out upon the dark river, over which the rising moon is just beginning to shed a pale lustre, and over which the huge black hulks of the ships of war rise threateningly. Their hearts beat quickly as they pass within hail. All s safe. They pass unseen, and in a few moments more land. We have seen your signals, exclaimed the watchers. Look there! And there, sure enough, from the dusky steeple the two warning lights shone out bright and clear. Now for Lexington. They bring Revere a beast of good mettle. He leaps into the saddle, puts spurs to his horse, and darkness closes around him. The steed with eyes of flame, sparks flying from his iron hoofs, his belly to the ground, the rider with pinched lips, eyes piercing the night, and bent eagerly over the saddle-bow, as...
